The aim of this analysis has been mainly to start from the traditional adopted peace building model in the context of the UN and move to alternative approaches to peace building which tend not to be focused only on short-medium term infrastructure and institution building, but which give people a more active and decisive role in the peace building process. The EU Peace Programmes, for example, did not explicitly create any of the above projects. We argue that such programmes have been effective at the local level precisely because they sought to empower communities in developing their own strategies for peace and reconciliation, and drawing on existing models and local resources, (as in the case of the CRC, which existed
